Property owners debate if they're in city limits

All city has to show them are maps

Another resident has joined the discussions Monday at the Irvine Council meeting about if their properties belonging in city limits.

After two local farmers left the meeting, Margaret Durbin, a resident of Chestnut Street, addressed the council about the same thing.

Durbin said she came to the council about the issue in 2009 and was told her property would be surveyed.

"Our city map shows your property is in the city," said Mayor Ernest Farmer.

"We bought that property in 1978," Durbin said.

Then in the 90s, she received a notice the city was going to annex the property on Chestnut Street.

"You never fulfilled what you told me you would do," she stated.

Durbin said she does not have any city services. Mayor Farmer said he would call Bee Williams at IMU the next day to get her city water.

Durbin stated that when she and her husband bought the property, they were told the city line ended at the railroad tracks. They started a business there in 1980, and never had a city privilege license.

"If it's on this map, it's going to be in the city from now on," said Mayor Farmer.

Earlier in the meeting, City Attorney Rodney Davis said he had received 18 cases involving the city of Irvine from the Secretary of State's office but none of them had anything to do with the dispute on Kirkland Avenue where the farmers own property.

"These maps were based on something," Davis stated. "They weren't just pulled out of the air."

"Our position is we are looking for a record. Until we see that, we don't feel like we should be paying (taxes)," said Danny Click.

Farmer said that earlier councils apparently did not do their jobs.

"Now, it makes us look like the bad guys," he stated.
