Public Notice

A friend who is a supporter, whose family has been supporter of this newspaper for many years, has contacted me by Messenger to state that a writer "made some comments about a good friend" of his and in the friend's opinion were "way out of line." He thinks a public apology is the least that can be done. My first response was that "no offense was intended toward the man." I felt like the writer identified with the individual as a friend and spoke of him in a compassionate way since the writer also suffered with the same problems. However, as the owner and publisher of this newspaper, I am responsible for what goes into it and to make any corrections when necessary and any apologies for any wrongdoings. Therefore, I want to apologize to this person, who is not being named to prevent any further confusion, and to his friends for any offense taken, and I want to thank his friend for correctly pointing out that I should right any wrong that was done.
